Q: Security of plaintext encryption My question is about verifying the integrity of a.NET web app which uses a static class for encryption/decryption of plaintext: public static string EncodeSecret(string secret) {

byte[] plaintext = System.Text
.Encoding.UTF8.GetBytes(secr et); byte[] encryptedtext = AES.Decrypt(plaintext, secret); return System.Text.Encoding.
UTF8.GetString(encryptedtext)
; } public static string DecodeSecret(string secret) { byte[] encryptedtext = System
.Convert.FromBase64String(se cret); byte[] plaintext = AES.Decrypt(encryptedtext, secret); return System.Text.En coding.UTF8.GetString(plainte xt); }

How do I be sure that the plaintext is not encrypted twice (once on the server and again on the client), or is it too much security to require? A: If the application is capable of two-way communications with the server in general, you can try to carry the original secret in the URL and check if it is decrypted correctly (you cannot do that without decrypting and verifying the sender's decryption result, since you could just as easily have sent it to a proxy server which could decrypt it again). I'm not saying this is what you should do, but if the code really was doing that then no attacker with a client or server-side shell would be able to get at the original, unencrypted, secret (except with a back door into your server). The singer-songwriter for 2 Chainz says his Super Bowl halftime show will show the audience what 'Bama fans "really feel about Miley Cyrus." 2 Chainz is one of the biggest music acts of the year, having released his debut album "Based On a T.R.U. Story" early 2012. So it makes sense he'd be performing at the Super Bowl. It's still unclear exactly what his halftime show will be like, but there's no doubt it'll be edgy, bold, and one of the best music acts of 2013. Speaking to the Independent, the rapper reveals the reason for his stage presence for the first
