Conventional methods for quantifying fungal contamination are labor intensive and require a significant time investment, while quantitative polymerase chain reaction (qPCR) assays are easy to perform and have the potential to be used for routine quantitative analyses. This study developed a qPCR assay targeting the ITS2 region of ribosomal DNA for quantifying fungal contamination of baby spinach leaves (Lactuca sativa) and strawberries (Fragaria x ananassa) after processing and storage. The analytical specificity of the assay was investigated by spiking produce samples with known fungal concentrations, resulting in qPCR amplification efficiencies ranging from 93.7% to 99.8%. Real-time qPCR detection limits were between 3 and 5 CFU/g of baby spinach and between 3 and 7 CFU/g of strawberries. Fungal contaminations in the processed and stored samples were below the maximum levels established by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. This qPCR assay is a quick and reliable alternative to the standard plate count methods, and it has the potential for more efficient and timely detection of fungal contamination of processed and stored produce, including before consumption. ARCO Tablets Review: Are they really for you?
