The text will be centered relative to the image's existing bounding box. You can also add a clipping mask to the image to keep strokes of the text on the top of the photo. This is especially useful for people who usually use the tool "Extract Strokes." You can also add an editable vector text box to an image, and edit it just like you would a layer. You get some tools for making that easier, like a Clone and Rotate tool already available. Stagewarp lets you stretch or distort a section of an image so that it fits into a smaller space. It's useful if you want to create a cropped Instagram or blog post in Lightroom. You choose the crop, and the program crops out a rectangular section in the center of the photo. Then, you use the Stagewarp dialog to set the crop options, like angle and scale, for the cropped section. The dialog also lets you preview the output image. Reduce the output image's resolution and file sizes, or increase the resolution and file sizes later. Stagewarp also lets you limit the compression, use a default crop, or crop to a square or circle, and can handle both JPEG and RAW formats. You can now interpolate the noise in a picture. In other words, it can add noise to an image to make it look sharper. You do that by choosing a noise profile from a Noise Settings drop-down menu (there's one for each noise type). You can also set the minimum and maximum strength of the noise profile.

It is possible to take prescanning of the content and make it extremely insignificant by caching a lot of content. What this means is that the browser does not actually need to request or fetch the content at all to display the content. Instead, the browser does some prescan and if the content is successful it can display the content instead of requesting a new fetch. With a lot of scrolling on websites, this is a great optimization to reduce bandwidth and load times. Now, you'll need a tool like WebPagetest or PageSpeed Insights to tell you what the load times are like. You can see that there is a significant improvement in load times over the previous pages loaded (you can compare the same two pages in the same browsers, and in the same cases, but with 1.5 million pixels vs 2.5 million pixels, you'll see a quicker load time.)
