Objective value is defined as what the software costs per hour of development time. Photographers and artists will get a kick out of this as they are the only group of users that really value it. To expand on objective value, let me mention that you can save a lot of time reworking your images over and over again if you aren't working with the software for several business hours. Today's digital photography business model is to create images and then collage them into a client's designs. Consequently, this means that graphics designers spend most of their time creating images instead of the actual design projects. Adobe products can work very fast, and they can save time and improve your workflow if you are shooting often and using similar images. It has gotten substantially easier to convert Type A/B/C images from Photoshop to PSD starting around Lightroom 4.0. If you are a typical designer, you will constantly push for faster. You don't care if your workflow is sticky or not... you just want to shoot a lot and convert images when you get home from work. How much does a few minutes faster save you? Over time, this should add up to a few $$$12,000. Relative to professional photographers, it's incredibly less expensive to buy these Adobe software suites and get busy than it is to hire a designer to create your brand/cover image ideas. If the designer gets those ideas to that point, it's time-consuming and expensive, and the designer will likely say and do things to push it into the client's pocket. From the client's pen out may carry more value for their budget than the designer's work.
